

Austin Robare

Professor Mary

Rhetoric 105

5 December 2016

Critical Response #2 Reflection

I found all the sources from this critical response very interesting and fun to read. This made it very easy to write a response to them. I found connections among each source that helped me analyze them. One of the sources was an interview with Ray Bradbury, a famous author most known for his book, Fahrenheit 451. I like him as an author so I thoroughly listened to his interview.

For my revision, I made many necessary changes. I looked at the comments to help me understand what I needed to change. I had some grammar errors and some sentences that could be made more concise. Now that I have been in this course, I can also see many mistakes on my own because of what I learned. Like I did in my first critical response, I failed to complete all the required components of the assignment. When I did this assignment, I did not yet receive feedback from my first critical response so I made some of the same mistakes. Once I knew what I did wrong for my first critical response, I had already turned in the second one. In this response, I did not include a title and I wrote it all in one big paragraph. For my revision, I made sure to add a title and separate my ideas into paragraphs for a cleaner paper. Now, I am much more pleased with my critical response and I understand that any paper can be improved no matter which draft.