

Matthew Cheung

Professor Mary Hays

RHET 105

31 August 2015

Impartial Respect and Acceptance

In “The Power of Hello”, Howard White outlines a self-rule that his mother had taught him to follow at a very young age. Although expressed more simply, the principles of Howard White’s self-rule parallel the civil duties addressed by the student code closely.

The primary focus of “Article 1” of the student code is to simultaneously ensure that students maintain their rights while respecting the rights of other students. Similarly, White learns that by greeting his colleagues regardless of authority he has acknowledged his co-workers. On the surface, this greeting may seem nothing more than a simple exchange of pleasantries. An acknowledgement of another, though, represents something of much greater value. To acknowledge someone represents that you consider them one of your equivalents, that you respect their values and opinions as much as your own. When Howard White addressed the founder of company, he did not see him as a towering figure who was superior. Howard saw someone who, though he greatly respects, was just as raw and human as the manual workers of the company.

Just like Howard’s self-rule, the Student Code does not discriminate on the treatment of other students. The Student Code encourages all students to interact with each other regardless of race, gender, religion and other orientations. The establishment of this environments creates an academic community in which all students/people are able to thrive.

The simple one-dimensional perspective that a student may have becomes a multi-dimensional view when it is enhanced by that student's ability to respect the ideas and opinions of others. White was able to gain insight from the founder of the company when he approached the man as an equivalent. His boss's comment completely altered the way White viewed his roll in the company. White's acceptance of the perspective of the founder of the company made him believe that it was possible for him to achieve more than he had initially assumed. Though a simple gesture, Howard's 'Hello' demonstrated all the values outlined by the Student Code.